In words from Eng., a final consonant is usu. doubled before -able, when doubled in the pres. pple., as clubbable, etc.

Adjs. in -bili-, -ble, were orig. active (and neuter) as well as passive; but the majority of the former remain only (if at all) with a passive force, as in credible, audible, which is also the only use of -able as a living formative, e. g. eatable, likeable, etc.

C

C (sī), the third letter of the Roman alphaphet, was orig. identical with the Greek Gamma, Γ, and Semitic Gimel, whence its form. In earlier Latin, it functioned both as (g) and (k); but subseq. it stood for the (k) sound only. When the Roman alphabet was introduced into Britain, C had only the sound (k). The present value of C is the result of developments which took place both in Britain and on the continent during the time covered by the OE. and ME. periods. (See N.E.D.)

In mod. English, C has (1) the 'hard' sound (k) bef. a, o, u, bef. a cons. (exc. h), and when final; (2) bef. e, i, y it has the soft sound (s). In all words from OE. and OF., final c is avoided: the (k) sound being written k, or ck, as in beak, book, etc. Final c however is written in mod. words from Latin, Greek, or other langs., and (of late) in the ending -ic, as in sac, epic, critic, etc. But where this c is followed in inflexion by e or i, it is changed to ck, as in physicking, pic-nicker, etc. When the (s) sound is final, it must be written -ce, as in trace, ice, etc., and this final e is retained in composition bef. a, o, u, as in trace-able, etc. (3) Ci (rarely ce) preceding another vowel has frequently the sound of (ʃ), esp. in the endings -cious, -cial, -cion, as atrocious, etc. This sound (which is also taken by t in the same position) is comparatively modern.

In foreign words, c occas. retains the foreign pronunciation, as in It. cicerone (tʃitʃerō·ne).

C springs: see Cee (springs): C clef: see Clef 1.
